I was about to board a plane, and I was ① scared. Not because I was afraid of flying, but because I was afraid of what ② awaited me at my destination. "I could turn around now," I said to myself. "I could just go back to my part-time job and have a nice quiet summer." The year was 2005. The plane's destination? Tanzania. I'd never ③ traveled anywhere so different before, and I had no idea what to expect. That scared me. But I had never been one to turn away from adventure, so when the rest of my group started ④ boarding, I did, too. Little ⑤ I knew that the next six weeks would change my life forever.

I traveled to Tanzania as part of a university program the summer after my freshman year. We spent several weeks @ volunteer at a community center and an orphanage.

(A) By volunteering, I became part of the lives of local families – sharing meals, playing with their kids, and visiting their homes. These experiences were eye-opening, educational, and inspiring. It was eye-opening to see how few possessions they had, yet how much love and personal strength they had.

(B) Though we did many other exciting things like going on safari and climbing Mt. Kilimanjaro, it was our volunteering time that stuck with me. Volunteering allowed me to truly connect with the people in Tanzania. If I had not volunteered, I would never have ⑥ get an inside look at their way of life.

(C) Also, it was educational to experience their culture: I learned to cook ugali, milk a cow, and wear a kanga. Lastly, it was inspiring to witness their close family ties and endless positivity. Volunteering abroad taught me so much about the world and about myself. I grew more in those few weeks than I did my entire first year of college.

8 다음 글의 소제목으로 적절한 것은?

When I returned home, I literally hugged my toilet, and I cried during my first hot shower. I didn't have these things in Tanzania. To this day, I sometimes say a silent "Thank you" as I turn on the tap to get a drink of water. Volunteering gave me deep gratitude for the comforts and opportunities I used to take for granted.

- ① Appreciation for New Cultures
- ② Commitment to Helping People
- ③ Courage to Take Risks
- ④ Gratitude for What I have
- ⑤ Hunger for Exploration

The local people are welcoming, strong, and overwhelmingly positive. Their language, clothing, and culture are beautiful. Growing up in rural New York State, I had never before experienced people so different from me. (A) (While / During) my time in Tanzania, I learned to appreciate those differences. Volunteering abroad taught me the beauty of diversity.

(B) (Though / Because) I was happy to return home, I was confident it would not be my last adventure. I knew I wanted to continue exploring, meeting people from different backgrounds, trying new foods, and discovering unique landscapes. It made me a travel addict.

I will be honest: Volunteering feels good. Giving back to others and seeing the smiles on their faces is a feeling unmatched by anything else. After experiencing this in Tanzania, I decided to help people wherever and whenever I could for them and for myself. It is something I try to do every day.
